

Rotary Peace Fellow
Raina Fox

Raina Fox has been doing grassroots social justice and peacebuilding work for a decade in the United States, India, Hong Kong, Morocco, and beyond. After working at museums and non-profits using arts and storytelling to advance social justice, she earned her Masters in Public Humanities from Brown University, where she focused on transitional justice, memory politics and civic engagement. For the past three years, she has led program partnerships at Millennium Campus Network, a non-profit based in Boston, USA, that partners with United Nations and other agencies to connect, train, and recognize undergraduate's students working towards the UN Sustainable Development Goals. Having experienced some of the complexities of advancing social change at the grassroots - both in her own work and supporting young people around the world from Liberia to Pakistan - she hopes to use her experience as a Peace Fellow to explore the systems that govern, shape, prohibit, and/or support the development and redevelopment of healthy societies. She is particularly passionate about ensuring that those most marginalized in societies- particularly women, LGBTQIA+, racial, ethnic and religious minorities, and young people - are at the center of policies, education, and civil society initiatives for peacebuilding and social justice.
